Caillou

Intended for pre-school children, the Caillou Series takes children on a journey of real-life situations.

These books see Caillou discovering the world around him as he moves towards a greater understanding of his environment.

For use both by teachers and parents, the books create a wonderful transition between play time and quiet/bed time.

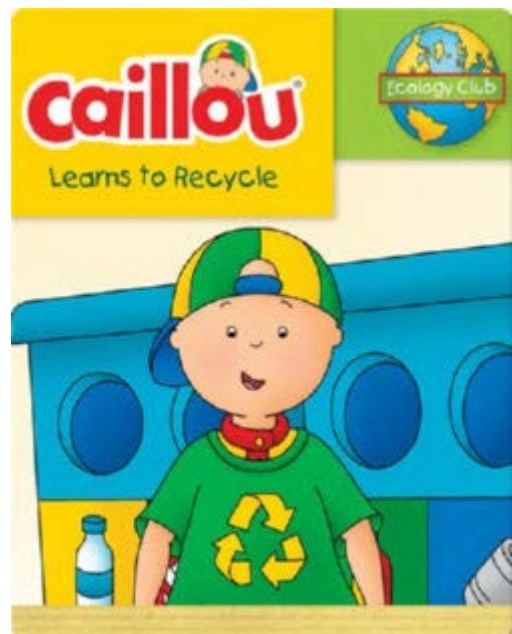

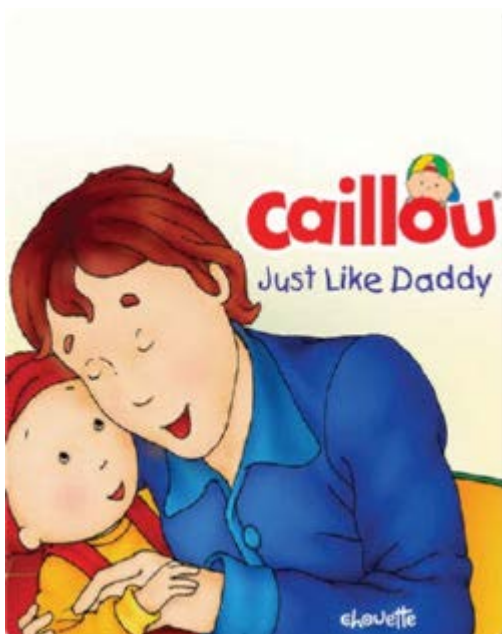

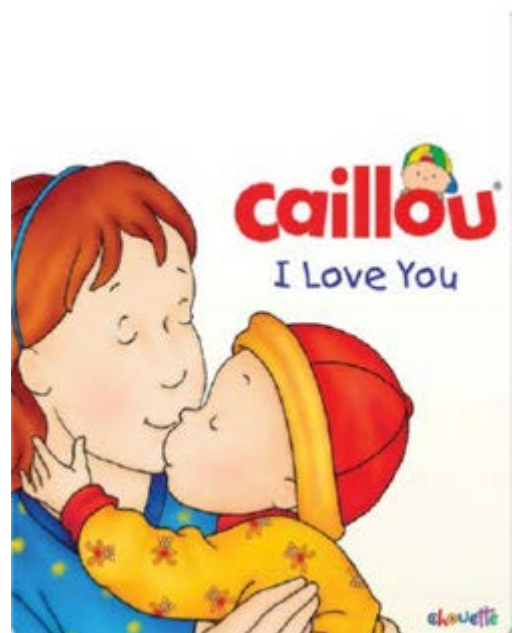

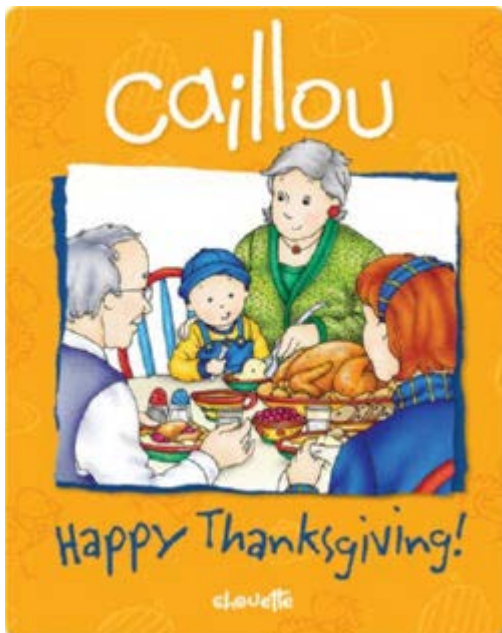

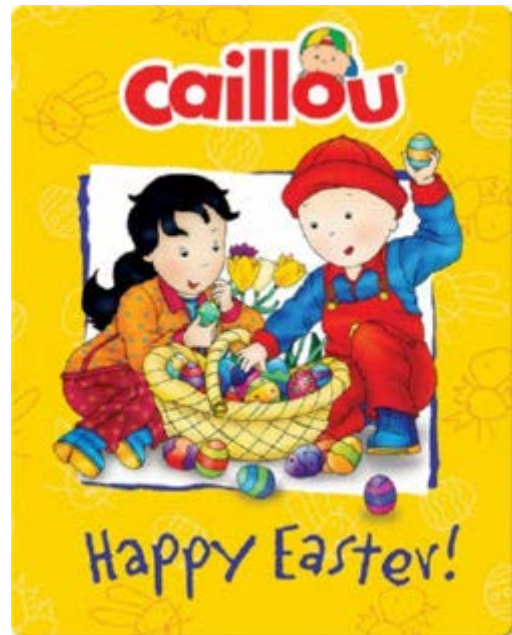

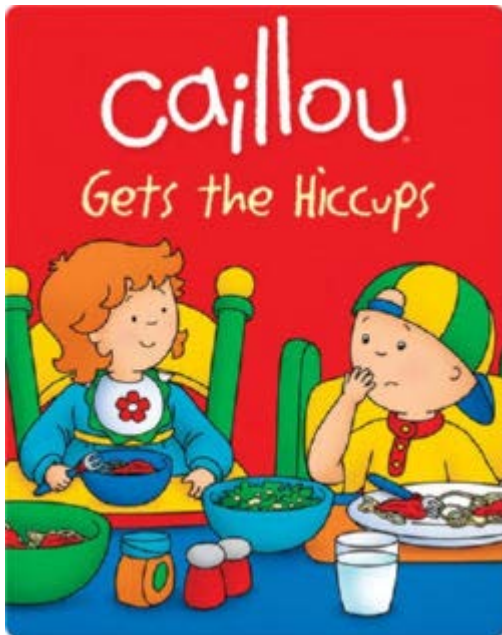

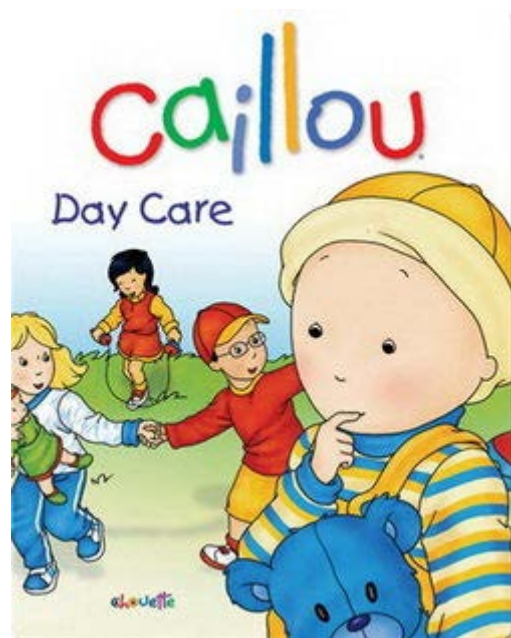

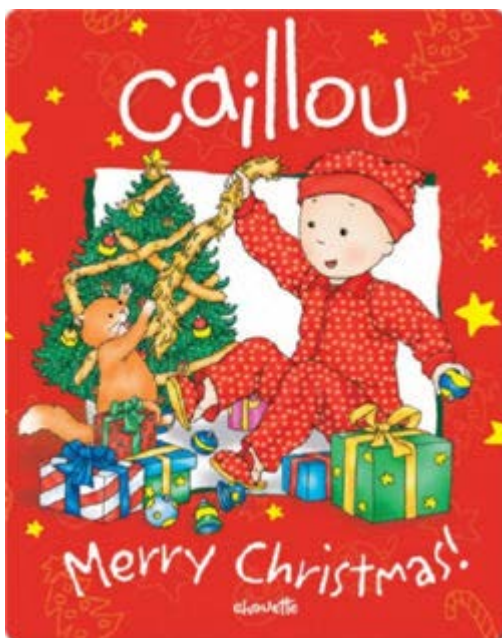

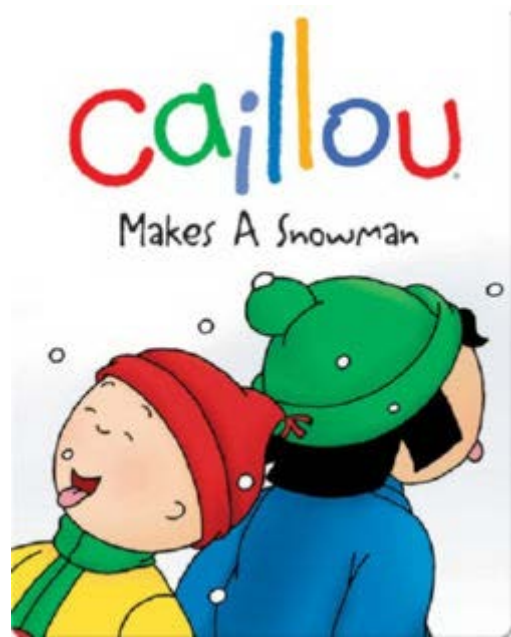

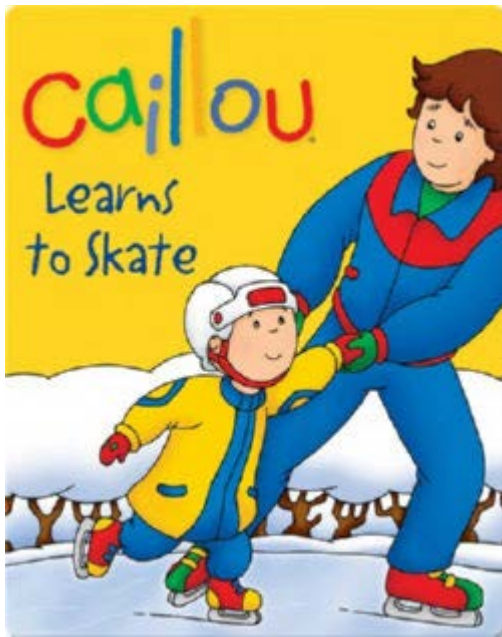

Hélène Desputeaux works for children. She has always done so. Since 1983 she has given them close to 115 picture books.

Images of Caillou, in all their various forms, rolling around the world were all created by Hélène Desputeaux!

Hélène Desputeaux is a bachelor of visual arts (B.A.V.) (Laval University, 1981) and bachelor of education (B.Ed.) (University of Quebec at Montréal, 1984). She completed one year of a master's degree in Science education, pre-school and elementary education (University of Quebec at Montréal, 1985).

Reception

On May 1, 2017, the National Post writer Tristin Hopper identified Caillou to be "quite possibly the world's most universally reviled children's program," noting "a stunning level of animosity for a series about the relatively uncontroversial daily life of a four-year-old boy."<sup>[22]</sup> Examples include several "I hate Caillou" pages made on Facebook, numerous parenting blogs criticizing the series, and petitions on Change.org for the show to stop airing.<sup>[22]</sup> A common criticism towards the series is the whiny and temper-tantrum behavior of the titular character and the lack of consequences Caillou is given for it.<sup>[22]</sup> As Hopper explained, "This has understandably led to theories that this is an accurate portrayal of Canadian parenting and that Canada is raising a generation of psychopaths. Or that Caillou's parents are so blasted on Canadian weed that they are unable to summon the presence of mind necessary to properly discipline their child."<sup>[22]</sup> He called the series "a toddler version of Sex and the City or Mad Men," criticizing its lack of educational value: "Unlike most children's programming, Caillou makes almost no attempt to educate its young audience. There are no veiled math problems, spelling lessons or morality tales; it's just calm, non-threatening, bright-coloured people navigating everyday tasks."<sup>[22]</sup>

A 2011 study conducted at the University of Virginia, published in the journal Pediatrics, tested the show's effect on preschool-aged children's attention spans and cognitive abilities. The study had three groups of four-year-olds each engaged in activities; one group watched Caillou, another watched SpongeBob SquarePants, and the third group drew pictures. After nine minutes, the children were tested on mental functions; those that watched Caillou had very similar results to the group that drew pictures, both of whom performed significantly better than the group that watched the SpongeBob episode.<sup>[23]</sup>

As Caillou appeared as a much younger child in the original line of children's books, the character originally had no hair. When illustrators found that adding hair made the character unrecognizable, it was decided that Caillou would never have hair.<sup>[24][25]</sup>

Caillou has used been as the primary character in the majority of videos that are a part of an online subculture known as "grounded videos", which are commonly made with programs such as GoAnimate and Plotagon and mainly depict the main character getting grounded by authority for breaking a rule.<sup>[26]</sup>
